A product manager is reviewing a customer feedback survey. They come across the following question:

"Don't you agree that our new, streamlined checkout process is a significant improvement that has made your shopping experience much faster and more enjoyable?"

Why is this question problematic?

- A. It is a leading question, as its phrasing presupposes a positive answer and uses emotionally charged language to steer the respondent.
- B. It is irrelevant, as it does not address the core goal of understanding the checkout process.
- C. It is unanswerable, because customers lack the data to compare the old and new processes.
- D. It is a bundled question, as it asks about multiple distinct concepts simultaneously.
